Welcome to my blog: MY JOURNEY AS A TECHNICAL PRODUCT MANAGER

Before I start sharing my journey, let me tell you a little about myself.

I'm Rimsha. I currently work as a Product Specialist and I have a BBA background. My goal is to become a Technical Product Manager.

Now, if I'm being completely honest, this journey started because I wanted to stop sounding stupid whenever technical product discussions came up.

But that's not the only reason.

A few things happened recently that really got to me. One was a fellow girlie colleague who genuinely believed our team needed a boy to survive. Then there were a few people who, intentionally or unintentionally, made me feel like I wasn't skilled enough.

And you know when something keeps bothering you because deep down you know there's some truth to it?

That's exactly what happened.

I've known for a long time that I needed to strengthen my technical side. I just kept postponing it. So instead of being annoyed every time someone questioned my abilities, I decided to do something about it.

Starting today, 25th June 2026, I've given myself 3 months.

Three months to learn Technical Product Management.

Not just by reading books and pretending I understand fancy terms. I actually want to learn how things work. APIs, databases, system design, product decisions, engineering conversations — all the things that currently make me open 17 tabs and then close them because it feels overwhelming.

This blog is basically me documenting the entire process.

What I'm learning.
What resources I'm using.
What makes sense.
What doesn't.
The things I get wrong.

The things I finally understand after spending three hours on a concept that should've taken twenty minutes.

Maybe at the end of these three months I'll be much closer to becoming a Technical Product Manager.

Maybe I'll realise I still know nothing.

Honestly, both are very possible.

Either way, this should be interesting.

Let's see what happens.
